Last year, the internet went into great debate over how to pronounce the Spanish retailer Zara. If you've never really given a second thought to the meaning behind the acronym, you're definitely not alone. Some stores just seem to have been there since the beginning of time. However, most retailers actually carry a very interesting story behind their name, and H&M is no exception. The name itself is brimming with history. When founder Erling Persson opened his first H&M shop in Sweden in 1947, he deemed it as Hennes, which translates into Swedish for "Hers." This was quite a literal rendering as Hennes only sold women's clothing at the time. Twenty one years later in 1968, Hennes acquired another brand, Mauritz Widforss, a Stockholm-based retailer that sold hunting and fishing equipment—an admittedly drastic change from the exclusive women's department he was used to. After dabbling in a different realm, Persson decided to delve into men's and TEENren's fashion as well. Obviously, the name couldn't stick around due to its complete inaccuracy, so he decided to tweak the name to Hennes and Mauritz. Even so, it wasn't until 1974 that Hennes & Mauritz finally shortened their name to the catchier (and more familiar) H&M. Once the brand abbreviated its name, they went on to rebrand all of their shops and expand beyond their Scandinavian territory. The first U.S. store finally opened its doors in 2000 on Fifth Avenue, New York, eventually spiraling into the global retail phenomenon we know so well today. [Image: Higg] The scorecard shows how a given fabric compares to conventional materials—a recycled cotton T-shirt, for example, versus a T-shirt made from regular cotton—on factors like water use, the carbon footprint, the use of fossil fuels, and water pollution. The scorecard gives products that have a lower impact than conventional items a score from 1 to 3. (H&M, so far, has 31 products that have a score of 1 or higher.) Brands submit their own material data, which is verified by a third party. Over the next year and a half, the scorecard will add more data, including the impacts from the factories that make each shirt or pair of jeans. While some companies already report sustainability impacts for some products, this standardized tool will make it easier for consumers to directly compare between brands. The scores might not be as clear as true lifecycle analysis data—some other companies, like the beauty brand Cocokind, are adding much more detailed environmental statistics on product packaging. But it does help show which products might have an edge. The highest-performing products will be able to add a new seal to show that they have less environmental impact.
